Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: ...any subject without gaining information. He spoke and wrote good English, was a careful reader and student of events, and was informed on all matters concerning the progress of the world. He had not only been liberally educated, but he had studious habits and fine literary tastes. He had the poetic gift and wrote excellent verse. Music was to him a divine art in which he took great delight and was somewhat proficient. As a reformer he was honest, brave and thorough; but his modest, quiet way of advocating unpopular views disarmed criticism, and those with whom he differed had no heart to quarrel with his position, or to seem to be opposed to his ideas. His presence had the effect to rebuke evil and to inspire goodness, to shame the thought of wrong and cruelty, and to ennoble life. He loved the truth, and combined the elements of "high thinking and plain living." His humble home was the centre of love and affection, and his literary taste and habits, as also that of all the members of the family, made the domestic circle one of quiet culture and refinement, of attractiveness and hospitality to all those influences that enrich life and add to the felicities of home and friendship. He was ever ready to act in any capacity as a helper to good citizenship, and took a deep interest in town affairs, and in all public spirit, but rarely accepted any office save in the interests of education and good morals. His last public utterance was an address in the Unitarian church on "Kindness to the dumb creatures," which to him was an indispensable part of a good man's religion. This man had no sordid ambitions for the accumulation of wealth or to the display its misdirection sometimes inspires. Indeed his lack of a robust constitution forbade his enga...
