Methods in steroid toxicology;; Report of a workshop held in Bonn, Dec. 1970

This symposium dealt with the problem of whether the methods used in steroid toxicology, applied both to research and clinical testing of steroids are still relevant and allow valid conclusions to be drawn regarding side effects in the human subject. Among the other subjects covered in this Symposium is the problem of whether the results obtained in long term toxicity studies of sexual hormones and their influence upon tumor growth in beagles can be related to man. The neuro-endocrine control mechanisms that exist in animals and man are quite different. Present toxicological methods have not taken into account sufficiently the differing sensitivity of the target tissues in man and animals; this applies equally to the differing mode of action of steroids, their pharmacokinetics and metabolism. The ultimate action of a hormone is dependent not only upon the absolute amount of the administered substance, but is considerably modified by steroid inter relationships as well as the time sequence in which the hormone is administered.
